Description

Module aims

1. Principal Module Aims This module aims to give first year students in Film Studies and Film and Literature an introduction to film and television criticism, building on the autumn term module Film and Television Analysis in which they learned the basic building blocks of close textual analysis in relation to these media. The module will always focus on introducing students to a sample of approaches to critical writing about film as well as the key critical turns in the study of television. There will be a historical focus to this work which will think about the development of film and television scholarship. As students gain confidence in the practice of textual analysis (in Film and Television Analysis in term one), they are encouraged to begin to make reasoned and carefully argued interpretations, and to reflect upon the validity of other accounts and interpretations, both in group discussion and through reading of critical scholarship on module films and programmes. The module has been designed to either offer a focus on wide range of films and programmes from different historical periods, film styles and, to a lesser extent, national contexts, or to focus in on a single case study from a variety of different critical angles, or a combination of these two approaches in the first and second part of the term. This is done in order that students might experience, and compare, different approaches to film and television criticism. The critical appreciation of films and television programmes is the foundation of learning and development on both undergraduate degrees, and this module provides the basis of this foundation. As with Film and Television Analysis in term one, this module will equip students to follow a film and/or television focus through the honours years of their degree, should they so choose. In the final year, students on both degrees take the core module Film Aesthetics, which revisits many of the issues raised at a basic level in this module.

Learning outcomes

By the end of the module, students should be able to:

- 8. Principal Learning Outcomes By the end of the module, students should be able to test, evaluate and where appropriate contest critical interpretations of cinematic and televisual works, offering alternative interpretations and analysis, demonstrating subject specific knowledge, understanding and key cognitive skills. They should be able to offer detailed textual analyses of a range of films and television programmes, which are critically informed by historically significant writing on film and television, and mobilise appropriate theoretical models in their critical analysis of television and visual culture. All students should be able to make appropriate historical and theoretical connections and distinctions between film, television and other aspects of visual culture explored elsewhere on their course.
