Module aims

The aim of this module is to explore the principles and issues of policy that may influence the creation and development of a tax system, with particular regard to certain aspects of income and capital taxation in the United Kingdom. Initially, this module seeks to identify and examine those principles and policy issues that shape tax systems and substantive fiscal provisions. This involves consideration of some fundamental questions: What are the characteristics of a good tax system? How are taxes classified? How does the introduction of a new tax, e.g. a 'green tax' or an alteration to an existing tax, (e.g. a rise or fall in the rates of income tax) affect the behaviour of taxpayers?

Attention is then directed toward the UK tax system which is largely founded on statute. The crucial interpretative role of the judges is highlighted; a role epitomised, in recent years, by the judicial approach to tax avoidance, and one which will be influential in the jurisprudence that evolves in relation to the newly enacted general anti-abuse rule (GAAR).

The remainder of the module involves the study of those aspects of the law relating to income tax and capital gains tax outlined below, and the analysis of the extent to which the areas of substantive law covered reflect the principles and policies studied earlier in the module.
