Description

Introductory description

What do we understand by 'Human Rights', as well as its associated (sub)categories of 'human' and 'rights'? Are rights absolute or is their provision and protection based on specific historical and political contexts? Is it possible and desirable to identify a core of universal human rights, or should they be considered relative? Are the problems and challenges faced by human rights discourse a consequence of inadequate implementation, or do these issues emerge from the way we understand human rights? And, if it is the latter, are there any other ways to conceptualise human rights?

This module looks at theories and histories of human rights to shed light on these and other such debates. By adopting an interdisciplinary approach and borrowing insights from legal theory, political science, philosophy and socio-legal studies, the module offers a contextual approach to human rights rather than a purely legalistic one. The main aim is to encourage the students to critically analyse the concepts, regimes, instruments, institutions and practices of human rights. The module will also highlight the successes, challenges, possibilities and paradoxes of human rights discourse and the international human rights regime. The module will ground these discussions in important topical phenomena by analysing issues surrounding globalisation, terrorism, humanitarian intervention, and socio-economic inequalities, among others.

Module aims

The module aims to develop:

A contextual and analytical lens to engage with the human rights discourse.

Knowledge of the human rights discourse and the international human rights regime, as well as some of their key successes, deficiencies and challenges.

An understanding of the legal, political, social and economic dimensions of human rights.

Knowledge of debates around topical human rights issues, using historical and theoretical approaches as analytical tools.

Outline syllabus

This is an indicative module outline only to give an indication of the sort of topics that may be covered. Actual sessions held may differ.

The module will broadly include the following topics, but changes will be made every year to engage with current debates and topical issues:

Introduction to Human Rights discourse

The foundations of Human Rights Law

Human Rights and Conceptual Precedents

'Histories' of Human Rights

Conceptual and Practical Challenges to Human Rights

Topical Case Studies

Learning outcomes
