Description

Introductory description

Justice, Democracy and Citizenship is designed to get you thinking – about ideas in politics and how they matter, and what happens when we put political theory to work on pressing real-world issues and dilemmas. We will explore the three core concepts in the title of the module through the lens of specific, real-world debates, such as the possibility of 'global justice', the question of reparations for historical injustice, competing ideas of representative and direct democracy, and whether being a citizen means that we have an obligation to obey the law. We welcome all students, not only those considering a focus on political theory in later years of their programmes of study.

Programme content

This module interrogates political theory in the world, focusing sharply on crucial concepts and case studies that help to bring them alive. It will be divided into three parts – on justice, democracy, and citizenship respectively – each consisting of three weeks of lectures and seminars. The module has been created as a lively way to explore key ideas in political theory: what the main arguments around them are, and how they might apply to and illuminate practical and policy dilemmas. After taking this course you will greet invocations of justice, democracy and citizenship with a new curiosity and a sharpened critical eye.

Module aims

This module aims to:

- introduce students to selected key debates on the ideals of justice, democracy, and citizenship;
- demonstrate how key political concepts can be applied to specific political dilemmas, cases and issues
- enable students to make an informed choice about whether to select a political theory pathway through their degree programme.

Outline syllabus

This is an indicative module outline only to give an indication of the sort of topics that may be covered. Actual sessions held may differ.

This module will be divided into three parts, corresponding to the three ideals mentioned in the title:

The first part, focusing on the ideal of justice, will address issues such as the following: What principles of justice, if any, can be used to assess relations between states and relations between members of different states? Are the vast inequalities of wealth and income that exist across the globe unjust, or do we merely have obligations of charity to assist those in other countries who cannot meet their basic needs? Does a state have a duty to admit refugees when others refuse, even if it has taken its fair share of them already? Does the idea of a just war still make sense and, if so, what are the criteria for determining whether or not a war is just? Does justice require reparations to be made for historical injustices?

The second part, focusing on the ideal of democracy, will address issues such as the following: What is democracy and why should we value it, given that it may, and sometimes does, deliver unjust outcomes? Do representative institutions require radical overhaul, in order to provide greater space for genuine deliberation? Should they be supplemented by various "democratic innovations", such as citizens' assemblies and referendums?

The third part, focusing on the ideal of citizenship, will address issues such as the following: What is it to be a citizen of a state and who should be regarded as a citizen? Do states have a right to exclude would-be immigrants and to determine who is permitted to live within their borders? Is there a case for lowering the age at which children can vote? Should prisoners be allowed to vote?

Learning outcomes

By the end of the module, students should be able to:

- The ability to demonstrate an appreciation of key debates around the concepts of justice, democracy and citizenship
- The ability to discuss intelligently the application and understanding of these concepts in specific political cases

- The capacity to analyse critically, both orally and in writing, political arguments with respect to the relevant issues and dilemmas
