Description

Introductory description

Home to nearly a quarter of the world's population with one of the fastest growing and largest economies in the world, China's rise to Great Power status is one of the most important issues in our time. But while the focus on China's international interactions might point to China's increasing power and strength, an analysis of domestic politics reveals a ruling communist party facing continued challenges in justifying its continued monopoly of power, and dealing with the economic and social dislocations that rapid economic development has brought. This module examines the complex political, economic and social transformations in China from the times of Mao Zedong to the present. It starts by embedding the study of the contemporary in a knowledge of China's recent history, with a focus on the consequences of China's revolutionary past for the current political order.

Module aims

Provide students with a thorough overview of how government and politics are organised and function in the People's Republic of China

Introduce students to the complex and distinct nature of Chinese politics, along with their historical and theoretical basis

Locate the theoretical debates on the nature of the Chinese political system within the contexts of both contemporary Chinese politics and modern Chinese history
