Description

Introductory description

Mainstream political discourses often allude to the fact that, in the context of globalization, there is little choice but to pursue particular kinds of policies. Critical discourses in political economy, on the other hand, have often spoken of the need to overthrow the hegemony of capitalism in favour of some alternative to it. This module scrutinizes the way in which discourses of this kind might be understood to combine in order to produce and reinforce liberal-market forms of capitalism. It aims to illustrate the complexity involved in identifying 'capitalist' and 'alternative' forms of social, political, and economic social relations, consider the processes through which the transformation of these social relations, and to introduce and critically discuss examples of both real and imagined alternatives to capitalism.
