Description

Introductory description

In short, this module aims to introduce to the various debates that have characterised the use of secret service by the state in the international and domestic context. Although the terms 'espionage', 'intelligence' and 'secret service' are all central to the concerns of this module they have been deliberately avoided in the above module description given in the handbook. This is because this module aims to situate all these things in a broader governmental context, viewing them as aspects of international statecraft or as constitutional problems or as issues of civil rights. Accordingly, this module is as much about how policy-makers make use, or fail to make use, of intelligence, and how secret services might be regulated within a constitutional framework, as about the practice of secret service itself.

Module aims

The module aims to:

- develop an understanding of the origins and developments of intelligence services
- explore the main theoretical approaches to intelligence and surveillance
- offer an understanding of the issues surrounding intelligence failure analyse key ethical and policy dilemmas and issues raised by CT intelligence assess the contemporary debates about globalization and the future of intelligence
