Description

Introductory description

Crime and Society seeks to introduce students to criminology and aims to provide a comprehensive and critical understanding of the relationship between crime and its social context. It explores current issues and recent transformations in the socio- political, global context of crime and justice and it aims to prepare students to explore crime, victimisation and punishment through conceptual categories such as class, gender, ethnicity, mobility and space. Students taking this module will develop the necessary analytical, theoretical and critical skills to examine contemporary problems and debates in the fields of criminalisation and justice and will actively engage with empirical research and policy material in this field.

Module aims

The main aim of this module is to provide students with a comprehensive understanding of the relationship between crime and its social context on the one hand, and current issues and recent transformations in the socio-political global context of crime and justice on the other.

This module explores sociological approaches to crime, deviance and criminal justice and seeks to introduce students to criminological research. It aims to prepare students to explore crime, victimisation and punishment through sociological-conceptual categories such as class, gender, ethnicity, mobility and space.

Students will develop the necessary analytical, theoretical and critical skills to examine contemporary problems and debates in the fields of criminalisation and justice and will actively engage with academic and policy material in this field. Key aims include:

- The imparting of knowledge about concepts and debates across the key areas of the sociology of crime and deviance, as well as clear indications of how these are informed by multi-disciplinary research at the boundaries of knowledge;
- To provide skills necessary to understand and assess the dilemmas of crime and justice in contemporary society. Students will develop their ability to critically engage in key debates within the field, and gain some of the tools necessary to understand the social, political, economic, and cultural contexts of crime, justice, security and disorder;
- To encourage students to interrogate the interface between the theory and practice of criminology and criminal justice.

Outline syllabus

This is an indicative module outline only to give an indication of the sort of topics that may be covered. Actual sessions held may differ.

Learning outcomes

By the end of the module, students should be able to:

- Main learning outcomes: • The development of an understanding of the problematic nature of popular representations of crime;
- An appreciation of the insights that sociological thought brings to the study of crime, deviance, victimisation and criminal justice;
- An ability to place the research on the sociology of crime and criminal justice policies and institutional practices in their historical, ethical, social, political, cultural and economic context;

- Critical awareness of the limitations of legal definitions of crime by exploring alternative approaches, such as social constructivism and social harm;
- An understanding of why certain behaviours are criminalised at particular times and places;
- Appreciation of how issues of race, class, location and gender affect processes of criminalisation;
- Active engagement with contemporary issues and debates within the fields of sociology and criminology in a global context;
- How to analyse issues from a critical and interdisciplinary perspective, taking into account social, political and theoretical arguments in the field of criminalisation;
- How to conduct effective research using both primary sources and secondary materials, including the use of empirical analyses of crime and punishment;
- Development of skills in accessing and evaluating relevant literature for independent study, research and essay writing.

Research element

Students will be required to engage with primary empirical research as part of their reading and classroom learning and will have to employ methodological knowledge skills to interpret criminological data. In addition, students will be invited to write an article review where they have to evaluate research practice, approaches, findings and implications in the field of crime and society.

Interdisciplinary

The module's readings draw mainly from criminology, which in itself is an interdisciplinary subject area. Readings also include legal and policy documents; and research material from the fields of sociology, penology, law, philosophy, politics and psychology.

International

Teaching material will be mostly focused on the Anglo-American context, with comparative examples from other jurisdictions wherever feasible.

Subject specific skills

Knowledge of the underlying concepts and principles associated with the study of crime and justice and an ability to evaluate and interpret these within the context of contemporary sociological study.

An ability to present, evaluate and interpret qualitative and quantitative data, in order to develop lines of argument and make sound judgements in accordance with basic theories and concepts in criminology and sociology.

The ability to evaluate the appropriateness of different approaches to solving problems related to criminological study

The ability to communicate the results of criminological study accurately and reliably, and with structured and coherent arguments

Transferable skills

Communicating complex arguments and debating

Team work in a learning environment

Independent study skills and research skills

The qualities and transferable skills necessary for employment requiring the exercise of some personal responsibility
