Description

Introductory description

This module seeks to introduce students to some of the major debates about how theorising and empirical research should be done, through examples of how it is being done. It seeks to situate this against the background of the sociological tradition and to give students a sense of where there is continuity, discontinuity, progress and/or decline.

Module aims

To introduce students to the latest developments in Sociology and related disciplines. To embed an awareness of current and ongoing debates in Sociology and a critical understanding of the possibilities of the discipline in terms of empirical research, theoretical developments, and methodological innovations.

Outline syllabus

This is an indicative module outline only to give an indication of the sort of topics that may be covered. Actual sessions held may differ.

This module will introduce students to current developments and debates in the field of sociology, linking this to the older traditions and currents of the discipline. Students will appreciate both the possibilities and the limits of Sociology as a discipline, through engagement with a wide range of approaches (in terms of methodology, empirical focus and theoretical approach), to develop their own interests in specific areas of work (in preparation for the dissertation) and to relate these specific interests to other sociological approaches. The two hour session will be broken down into a one hour lecture and one hour seminar devoted to key readings.

Summative assessment will be by a 4,000 word essay in which students must demonstrate their engagement with some of the debates that have been presented to them. They may choose a specific field of interest from those that have been presented (or beyond) but their coursework will focus on the development of independent critical analysis of debates both within this specific area, and its links to broader fields of social science.

The precise curriculum will vary from year to year, depending on the availability of individual academic staff. An indicative term may look something like the following:

The Craft of Sociology: State of the Art or State of Science?

Theorising, or skill and clumsiness in the use of concepts

Spies and Cannibals: the perils of ethnography

What makes your case so special?

What's new in comparative sociology?

Interdisciplinarity

Rationality, relativism and postcolonial studies

Writing well and writing badly

Learning outcomes

By the end of the module, students should be able to:

- (1) Demonstrate knowledge of recent debates in Sociology and their relationship to longer-standing traditions in the discipline.
- (2) Demonstrate critical analysis of the current state of Sociology as a discipline in a specific area of specialism.
- (3) Relate aspects of methodological, empirical and theoretical traditions and innovations in Sociology to one another, and to a specific area of interest.
- (4) Apply analytical skill to relate a specific area of sociological interest (research, theory, and/or method) to broader developments in Sociology and beyond.
