Description

Introductory description

Shock, fear, trauma; feelings of being unsafe, unwanted and misplaced; expressions of anger, dismay, and despair; perceptions of assaults on senses of self, identity, and community. In light of phenomena ranging from economic uncertainty to migration crises to terrorist attacks to Brexit to post-truth politics, these descriptors are characteristic of the Zeitgeist in political and public discourse in much of the Western world. They are also at the heart of the Critical Security Studies (CSS) field, which shifts our focus away from statism and traditional security issues. While conventional approaches to the study of security might ask “What are the national security prerogatives of a country, and how do they translate into conduct in the international arena?”, in CSS we pull back the curtain on what security does. As we shall see, life, death, statehood, community, class, race, gender, and individual perspectives are deeply intertwined in any attempt to define of ‘security’.

Zooming in on “What is security?” and equally importantly, “What is critique?”, the module engages with a broad range of ‘critical’ theoretical lenses, methods and techniques of critical analysis. We will discuss how security practices work, what they do, how they shape - and how they are shaped by - discourses, power relations, and different forms of knowledge. To be ‘critical’, first and foremost, means to be open to challenges that disrupt the familiar, and to be willing to explore and experience new perspectives, new ‘truths’, which, while always eye-opening, may not always be comforting and comfortable.

Module aims

- Provide an advanced level discussion of key contemporary theoretical debates about the meaning of security in international relations.
- Allow students to identify and explore 'new' issues on the global security agenda through a 'critical' lens.
- Encourage critical thinking about the meaning and practice of security.
- Develop student abilities to present a well-made, coherent and logically consistent argument supported by a coherent theoretical framework.
- Enhance student research skills through the collection and analysis of information from a wide range of sources.

Learning outcomes

By the end of the module, students should be able to:

- Demonstrate an advanced knowledge of the theoretical and conceptual debates associated with 'critical security studies' and their relation to 'traditional' security studies
- Assess the strengths and weaknesses of different critical approaches to the study of security

- Locate the critical study of security within broader debates in International Security and International Relations
- Demonstrate familiarity with the range of contemporary issues that could be conceptualised as security threats
- Demonstrate familiarity with contemporary dynamics and politization of security

Subject specific skills

At the end of the module students should be able to demonstrate knowledge of key issues and conceptual provocations in critical security studies. You should have acquired a hands-on, critical toolkit to analyse and reflect on contemporary security practices and our own involvement in them, such as counter-terrorism, human security, border security, the securitization of migration, or the gendered dynamics of violence and conflict. And you should have gained the ability to reflect on the possibility of change, on how we might think about security differently to transform the status quo of actual security practices and the practice of theorizing.

Transferable skills

Students should also be able to have acquired transferable skills, in particular the ability to: (a) apply CSS methods and techniques to consolidate, extend, and apply your knowledge and understanding of international security; (b) apply detailed critical analysis and interpretation of a variety of primary and secondary sources to initiate and carry out research projects; (c) process complex material and ideas within the broad field of critical security studies, consider unfamiliar ideas, and challenge your existing ways of thinking; (d) synthesize ideas drawn from different branches of the International Security disciplinary field to understand the emergence, dynamics, and implications of security policy agendas; and (e) communicate clearly key information, ideas, and problems in group discussion, as well as in oral and written presentations.
