Description

Introductory description

What is the sociology of gender and why does it matter? This module answers this question drawing on the wealth of expertise within Warwick Sociology, taught by staff who teach, research and write about gender from a range of perspectives. The first part of the module addresses how gender is conceptualised, including central theories of gender and the importance of taking an intersectional approach. The second part of the module addresses the sociology of gender in everyday life, applying theory and concepts to demonstrate how gender shapes our social world. The module ends with a focus on feminist movements seeking to 'undo' gender and gendered inequalities.

Module aims

To develop knowledge of the sociology of gender, particularly in a British context. To enable students to understand how gender is socially constructed and the material consequences of this. To foster better understanding of intersectionality, that is the empirical and theoretical interconnections between gender and other axes of difference, such as class, (dis)ability, race and sexuality. To enable students to apply their understanding to key areas of everyday life, such as popular culture, personal relationships, education, work and politics.
