Description

Introductory description

“Life is not complete without shopping” (Chua, 2003). This module investigates globalised commercial cultures and explores the production of consumption by looking at processes of ‘cultural intermediation’. The will provide an in-depth critical understanding of the sociology of consumption as it explores the operations of global capitalism by understanding how commodified goods, services and experiences are produced. We will look at practices of humdrum and spectacular consumption, at the growth of brand cultures and at how marketing and advertising try to generate feelings in consumers. We will study consumer cultures in developed and emerging economies to critically consider the promises and seductions of the world of goods, services and experiences. Some questions we will consider include: is a globalised commercial culture homogenising? Is ethical consumption possible? Does a good commercial worker have to be an active consumer? Are we always ‘working’ as consumers to generate value in capitalism?
