Module aims

This module provides an opportunity for an extended and independent research-based dissertation in the field of theatre and performance. It entails long-form and in-depth development of work, resulting in a fully-written dissertation. It enables students to develop their work through phases, supported by structured class activities, supervision meetings and independent research using appropriate methods of enquiry and project development. The schedule includes a conference presentation and poster presentation that are designed to elaborate on the principles of the research and aid in the development of the final work for assessment. The module enables students to complete an individually-written dissertation of 10,000 words on a research topic of their choice and based on their investigation of primary and secondary sources. Each student taking this route is allocated a supervisor and the topic must be one that can be appropriately supervised by a member of staff in the Department. In some exceptional cases, by agreement, a student may be jointly supervised. The written dissertation must be based on clear historiographical, dramaturgical, and/or theoretical/conceptual principles. It should make apparent the context of the research, the research methodology involved and the research questions it is posing.
