Description

Introductory description

What does it mean to 'know' a language, and to communicate in one? How do people learn a second language? What is the best way for you? And what are some of the global realities surrounding language use in the world today? These are the main issues to be addressed in this module. In this module, you will both engage in learning a major language and at the same time develop your ability to learn any language into the future. Which of these languages will you start with: Arabic, Chinese, French, German, Italian, Japanese, Russian or Spanish? All of them are on offer. While you're encouraged to begin a new language you can continue with one you already know if you prefer.

Module aims

- To enable students to communicate effectively in Arabic, Chinese, French, German, Japanese, Russian or Spanish [these being the languages offered by the Language Centre as academic modules at Level 1 - i.e. beginners level; see Appendix], at a basic level in everyday situations for a work or study placement
- To provide information and promote reflection on the process of learning a foreign language, with a view to enhancing students' ability to learn any foreign language in the future.

The module will contribute primarily to the achievement of Course Aims #1, 2, 5 and 6.

1. provide a thorough grounding in theories and research findings related to intercultural interaction and linguistics;
2. give students an in-depth understanding and awareness of the nature of generic, discoursal and linguistic features relevant to different cultural and professional contexts;
3. develop students' ability to use language sensitively and effectively in intercultural contexts;
4. provide students with the experience of learning a foreign language and reflecting on the process, and the opportunity to develop proficiency in another language;

Outline syllabus

This is an indicative module outline only to give an indication of the sort of topics that may be covered. Actual sessions held may differ.

Key topic areas:

1. The social context of multilingualism and linguistic diversity
Linguistic diversity as a global and social phenomenon, societal and individual multilingualism.
2. The theories and processes of foreign language learning

Research element

The assessment for the applied linguistics component of this model adopts autoethnography as a research method and develops students' abilities to research their own experiences of language learning and use.

Interdisciplinary

This module aims to integrate learning across two broad disciplinary perspectives, modern languages learning and applied linguistics, by integrating these components into a single module. Students in the module will have the opportunity to combine the study of a language and its culture with the study of topics from sociolinguistics, second language acquisition and education studies to develop a transdisciplinary perspective of the nature and processes of language learning.

International

This module has a specifically international focus involving the development of communicative abilities in another language and intercultural understanding. It also examines the nature of personal multilingualism and ethical and social issues involved in communicating in and across languages.

Subject specific skills

Subject-specific Skills/Professional Skills

- plan, monitor and evaluate in ways appropriate to her/himself the learning of a new foreign language
- apply linguistic concepts and tools acquired via the core Linguistics module (specifically, insights into phonetics, phonology, syntax and lexicogrammar) to the practical study of a new language.

Transferable skills

Work collaboratively in teams

Communicate clearly (with regard to language learning experiences) and contribute effectively in discussions

Consider written and internet resources critically and selectively with regard to own language learning concerns

Communicate ideas effectively in writing, using appropriate wording and structure.
