Description

Introductory description

Across the last 100 years, writers have debated the nature of cinema as a medium, its relationship to reality, history, and social politics. During this term, we examine a range of film theories that ask: what are the particular capacities and propensities of the moving image? What are its limits? How does the medium engage us as viewers? Note: Although film analysis is not the primary focus of this module, the films and media texts will serve as a crucial common ground for our discussions. Each week's film has been chosen to allow us to explore and expand on what the theoretical writings propose.

Module aims

- To provide an understanding of central debates about the moving image.
- To provide the opportunity to reflect on different theoretical frameworks.
- To encounter complex writing and learn how to read it with precision.
- To practice using conceptual and theoretical language with precision.
- To apply theoretical models, creating close textual analyses of specific film texts.
