Description

Introductory description

This module will examine the role played by museums and exhibitions in the production of contemporary art and culture. We will study exhibition practices through the lens of both art and architecture. 'Exhibiting' refers to the spaces and narratives created by displays – from ethnographic collections and conceptual art to shifts in the public's ways of seeing. Nation building and national rivalry, politics, ideology, and aesthetic revolutions weave throughout the history of exhibitions. Students will learn that the manner in which art is displayed is never neutral.

Module aims

The aim of this module is to examine the importance of exhibitions for the interpretation of contemporary art and architecture. Exhibitions will be examined in terms of time, space, and discourses of 'showing' understood in the broadest sense. Taught in Venice through lectures, seminars and site visits, the module will involve the study of current exhibitions of contemporary art and architecture within and beyond the frame of the Biennale. We will also study key texts on contemporary art, curating, and museum history.
