Module aims

Family law is a fascinating and dynamic subject that raises important issues of social policy. The course focuses on the way that the law regulates entry into, behaviour during, and exit from, certain types of adult relationships. Until relatively recently English law conferred rights on couples only if they were married. Over the last thirty years, however, new rights have been conferred on cohabiting couples (although the rights of such couples remain less extensive than those of their married counterparts), same-sex couples now have the option of entering either into a civil partnership or marriage. One of the fundamental questions addressed in the course is how the law differentiates between different types of adult relationships. Students are encouraged to set the issues in context by reading a wide range of materials and researching the social background to particular legal issues. Students are also encouraged to think about the way in which the law operates in practice.

Outline syllabus

This is an indicative module outline only to give an indication of the sort of topics that may be covered. Actual sessions held may differ.

What is 'family law' about? How does the law define and regulate different types of families?

Entry into marriage and civil partnership: who can marry or enter into a civil partnership and how do they do so?

Divorce and dissolution: how does the state regulate exit from formal partnerships?

Domestic violence: the protection offered by the law

The division of assets on relationship breakdown

Cohabitation: the current rights of cohabitants and proposals for reform

Learning outcomes

By the end of the module, students should be able to:

- Understand which types of adult relationships are regulated by the law, how, and why.
- Identify the relevant sources of key principles of family law. Understand the operation of family law in society and demonstrate a realistic understanding of the current practice of family law.
- Understand the operation of family law in society and demonstrate a realistic understanding of the current practice of family law.
- Research a topic in family law using paper and electronic resources and specialist legal materials.
- Work collaboratively to complete a defined task within a limited time
- Understand and use legal concepts, policy principles and theoretical ideas in speaking and writing about law and family practice.
- Analyse past, current and future law and policy developments in terms of theoretical issues and in terms of their impact on individuals & families
- Work independently to gain understanding of material and issues in family law without explanatory lectures
