Description

Introductory description

This module provides an introduction to the study of world politics through the eyes of comparative politics scholars. It offers a broad overview of substantive questions such as states and political regimes, democracy, authoritarianism, revolutions, nationalism, and migration. It delves deeper into how these macro-phenomena affect the micro-politics of state institutions such as governments and parliaments, parties and elections, grassroots movements and referendums, and others. While comparative politics is classically the study of domestic politics within states, this course considers also international dimensions such as monitoring of elections and democracy promotion. It further innovates by integrating a transnational dimension, showing how states reach out politically to their citizens and diasporas abroad, thereby rendering comparative politics extraterritorial.

Module aims

The module aims to:

- to analyze key issues in the study of comparative politics;
- to introduce students to the comparative method and its application to empirical and systematic political science research including learning the "vocabulary";

to expose students to a number of contemporary examples of democratic and non-democratic politics and to encourage comparison across countries;
to develop generic skills such as the research and interpretation of political science literature, the analysis of empirical material, the preparation and presentation of the results of comparative political analysis.
