Description

Introductory description

This module provides Psychology students with an opportunity to work with an organisation to support and advance their outreach and engagement portfolio in an area linked to Psychology. Students undertaking this module will also participate in seminars to explore different theoretical and practical aspects of outreach and public engagement. The module will enable students to:

1. develop an understanding of and expertise in outreach and engagement around a topic related to psychology;
2. learn key career skills such as project management, time management, working to a brief;
3. work in a professional capacity - liaising and collaborating with colleagues, stakeholders and clients;
4. Develop transferable skills (e.g. leadership qualities, self-confidence, communication skills). Students will work with a range of host organisations, including charities, community centres and groups, and other clients, to support, design, develop and deliver resources and materials for outreach and engagement. Resources can include marketing material, social media communications, community events, presentations, research outputs, teaching resources etc. The placement project could be anything within the remit of Psychology and/or apply the research methods used in psychology.

Further information:

- a) this Module cannot be taken by Psychology students who have completed a full-year or part-year intercalated year work placement.
- b) this module has a limited number of places available. Students will be selected for this module through a competitive application process.
- c) travel costs: students are expected to travel to and from their placement location by public transport unless otherwise agreed in advance with the Department of Psychology. Students are expected to meet the costs associated with their travel to and from their placement location. Students who wish to be considered for reimbursement of these travel costs should submit receipts to the Department.
