Description

Introductory description

A module which will introduce undergraduate students to contemporary issues and debates in Special Educational Needs, Disability and Inclusion. Students will critically explore the concept of inclusion, learning about its history, theoretical underpinning, and the dilemmas and tensions associated with it in practice. The module will broaden students' knowledge of SEN/D policy in England, the roles and responsibilities of practitioners and teachers in early identification and intervention, and common areas of need (e.g. learning disabilities, autism, speech, language and communication needs). This is an interdisciplinary module with links to psychology, sociology and disability studies.
