Description

Introductory description

Why do we speak differently in different situations? Can you identify the different features of a Geordie and a Liverpool accent? Do men and women really speak differently? And what underlies these differences? In ET216 we explore questions like these as we examine the relationship between language use and social context. This course builds on ET119 (Language in Society), but goes deeper to help you develop a greater understanding of the relationship between language use and its social context. It also provides you with an opportunity to conduct your own sociolinguistic research study. After taking this module, you will be armed with a set of theories, insights and skills to be able to address questions such as those above, and explore your own questions in relation to how language works in our world.

Module aims

The module will:

1. Introduce you to key sociolinguistic theory and concepts for explaining how our language varies in social contexts.
2. Help you develop a greater awareness of the relationships between language and social context, and how these relationships are signalled through language.

3. Help you develop an understanding of the tools and methodological insights needed to explore language variation in our social world.
4. Consider issues related to language use and social context, with particular attention to language attitudes.

Outline syllabus

This is an indicative module outline only to give an indication of the sort of topics that may be covered. Actual sessions held may differ.

The syllabus will cover the following areas, though weighting will vary:

What is Sociolinguistics? Overview and core concepts; Variation, social factors and social dimensions and Variations of English; Language variation: Multilingual speech communities; Domains and Diglossia; Code-switching and language maintenance, shift and death; Social dialectology: gender and age-grading; Social dialectology: regional dialects and ethnicity; Style, accommodation theory and audience design; Genres and registers; Language attitudes: attitudes to accents and attitudes to language; Stereotypes and sociolinguistic universals.

Learning outcomes

By the end of the module, students should be able to:

- Students will: Develop a deeper understanding of and appreciation for how language carries social meaning. Learn and critically evaluate theoretical concepts that help to explain the relationship between language use and society. Be able to comment on sociolinguistic practice by applying theoretical concepts to the linguistic practices of a range of social groups, communities, cultures and/or countries. Explore the social consequences of decisions about the use of language at macro (country-wide) and micro (in smaller social groups) levels. Debunk stereotypical views of language and society.

Research element

This module foregrounds research and encourages students to critically evaluate and conduct sociolinguistic studies. By the end of the module students should be able to conceptualise a sociolinguistic study of their own, collect and analyse data in order to carry it out, and report on the findings.

Interdisciplinary

Sociolinguistics is interdisciplinary in nature. Sociology and psychology are particular disciplines that inform the socio-side of sociolinguistics. This module will help students to develop and support broader arguments about society and how it works through close attention to language patterns.

International

This module is committed to the wider world. We draw on material from a number of different national contexts and consider global trends in the use of language as a social tool. Students are also encouraged to share insights from their own countries and contexts when applying the concepts of the module.

Subject specific skills

- Develop a deeper understanding of and appreciation for how language carries social meaning.
- Learn and critically evaluate theoretical concepts that help to explain the relationship between language use and society.
- Be able to comment on sociolinguistic practice by applying theoretical concepts to the linguistic practices of a range of social groups, communities, cultures and/or countries.
- Explore the social consequences of decisions about the use of language at macro (country-wide) and micro (in smaller social groups) levels.
- Debunk stereotypical views of language and society.

Transferable skills

- Recognise social patterns that are signalled and embedded in linguistic practices.
- Analyse graphs and raw data findings through the application of theoretical concepts to be able to develop arguments.
- Identify and respond to a sociolinguistic issue or situation requiring further investigation.
- Develop project management and time-management skills as you design, carry out and write up a sociolinguistic research project.

- Develop and demonstrate your resilience and problem-solving abilities.
 - Practice communicating complex ideas and presenting your work in clear and engaging ways.
 - Participate in group tasks and discussions and develop your ability to communicate effectively in English in mixed cultural groups
 - Develop and demonstrate intellectual curiosity in the field of sociolinguistics.
