Description

Introductory description

This module aims to give first year students in Film Studies an introduction to visual cultures and, in particular, to proximate media forms and questions of medium specificity.

Module aims

The module aims to complement and enrich students' year one work on film and television by exploring mediums proximate to television and cinema as well as by introducing students to the analytical and historical study of specific visual cultures. The term is divided into two units, a structure that allows for short intensive studies of discrete mediums, periods, genres, technologies, artistic practices, visual regimes, or mediascapes.

Outline syllabus

This is an indicative module outline only to give an indication of the sort of topics that may be covered. Actual sessions held may differ.

In the first half of the module we focus on comics, a medium that is historically and aesthetically related to cinema, yet is also profoundly different in many ways. Students look at various kinds of comics from key points in the medium's history to explore how formal, historical, industrial and cultural factors shape the medium. Studying comics enables students to consider how various kinds of image combine with other formal elements in visual culture, while the medium is also particularly pertinent to consider in the current media landscape where comics have provided source material for and influenced some of the most prominent texts and trends in popular culture.

In the second half of the module, we complicate ideas of medium specificity by considering ways in which different media can interact with one another. Students explore theories of adaptation alongside other concepts that have been developed to understand the complex interactions between texts and media that are evident in the contemporary media landscape.

Learning outcomes

By the end of the module, students should be able to:

- Discuss and interrogate issues of medium specificity.
- Make historical and theoretical connections and distinctions between visual media.
- Mobilise theories that outline interactions between texts and media when critically analysing individual texts or groups of texts.
- Reflect on the ways in which interactions between visual media have influenced the development of these media.
