Description

Introductory description

Although the development and implementation of law is most obviously and closely associated with key institutions of the state (executive, legislature, judiciary), many other forces are in fact involved. Among these are private economic actors and markets that set much of the legal (including regulatory agenda) in the run up to the 2008 financial crisis.

This course, however, explores another vitally important series of actors, social movements and NGO's, often grouped under the heading of civil society actors. Historically speaking civil society groups have not simply exerted pressure upon the state, but on many occasions even defined its very contours. Under conditions of constitutional crisis, civil society movements have become decisive and transformative. Anti-colonial struggles are an obvious example. In other areas, ranging from race and the environment, to women's rights, labour rights, human rights, civil liberties, etc., civil society groups have shaped legislative outcomes that are now taken for granted. Their legal strategies, tactics, successes – and failures - are a significant theme in this course.

The aim of this module is to place these forces into theoretical, historical, contemporary and comparative perspective. Using case studies (see below) the module examines civil society and activism in relation to the national states forces of globalisation. The vexed question of the relationship between civil society organisations and law remains present throughout.

Module aims

By the end of the module the student should be able to:

Develop a historical and theoretical perspective regarding the relationship between civil society, the state and law.

Locate the contemporary and historical importance of civil society organisations and activism within processes of legal change.

Outline syllabus

This is an indicative module outline only to give an indication of the sort of topics that may be covered. Actual sessions held may differ.

Conceptualising civil society, exploring its relationship with law and the state

Incorporating feminist, race, labour, human rights and other struggles within state discourse: the historical contribution of civil society and activists to legal change.

Tensions between the state and civil society: legality, legitimacy, social injustice and direct action tactics

Case studies in contemporary mobilisation: the Arab Spring, deglobalisation movements, landless struggles, cyber struggles, sovereign debt struggles, migration struggles

Learning outcomes

By the end of the module, students should be able to:

- Develop a theoretical perspective upon debates about role of civil society and the state
- Locate the historic importance of civil society organisations in processes of legal change
- Demonstrate a critical understanding of the nature and dilemmas associated with activist struggles in a variety of contemporary contexts and relate these to contemporary legal debates
- Demonstrate an ability to work effectively in groups to examine specific topics related to the module
- Demonstrate an advanced ability to deliver effective oral presentation skills
- Demonstrate an advanced ability to assess critically the legal, political and public texts relating to the subject of civil society and activism
- Demonstrate high quality research, interpretation and drafting skills in relation to texts dealing with law and civil society
