Description

Introductory description

What makes you feel good or bad, and why? How do you convince other people to do what you want them to? What is happening when you feel disgusted by a situation, or empowered to take action, or blissfully secure, or anxious about the future?

Emotion - feelings - are integral to our everyday life and functioning as human beings - and they are inherently social. We often think of emotions as personal, internal and individual, but as sociologists we should also notice that emotions are produced and given meaning through interactions with other people and with institutions. This module will help students to identify how emotion and feeling appears in social life - both in public and in private - and to analyse how feelings relate to individual action and the functioning of social structures. The module will look at theorisations of particular kinds of emotion in social, political, geographical and historical context, with an emphasis on a sociological approach influenced by cultural studies.

Module aims

To introduce students to sociological theorisations of emotion

To develop students' understandings of political processes that are both embodied and structural

To enable students to identify and assess how social processes are mediated through feeling and meaning
