Description

Introductory description

“Neoliberalism” seems to be the catch word, the linguistic omnivore of our times. Twenty years ago, the term “neoliberalism” barely registered in English-language debates, including academic discourse. Perhaps not surprisingly, the use of the term exploded after the financial crash of 2007-8, the most severe worldwide economic crisis since the 1929 Wall Street crash. Almost overnight, the use of the term ‘neoliberalism’ became ubiquitous. Public debate and academic research began to seriously investigate the economic, political and socio-cultural conditions of ‘neoliberalism’ its potential and challenges.
But what exactly hides behind the term ‘neoliberalism’? Based on recent research from history, philosophy, political science, sociology, history of economics, cultural studies, and cultural anthropology, this module examines the history of ‘neoliberalism’, its ideas and practices, its promises and challenges. It introduces a critical understanding of neoliberal ideas, from their first theoretical formulation at the beginning of the 20th century to their current application in today's neoliberal governance. At the core of the module's stands the exploration of neoliberal ideas on the market, the state, and human behaviour in the past and present.

Module aims

The module offers a historical understanding of the changing nature of ‘neoliberalism’, from its first theoretical formulation by European and American intellectuals at the beginning of the twentieth century to today. The module examines and explores the philosophical, political, sociological, psychological, economic, scientific, and social-cultural ideas and concepts that have informed neoliberalism since the 1920s. Designed as a ‘history of the present’, the module encourages students to examine and evaluate the historical conditions in which these theories emerged. The module also enable them to critically analyse how these theories have shaped the organisation of individual 'lived experience' and social life in liberal democracies. An important module focus is also the exploration how to effectively evaluate and critique the challenges that neoliberal ideas pose for current and future governance in liberal democratic societies and the well-being of its citizens.

Research element

The module researches the understanding of the past and present of neoliberal governmentality by collecting, examining, evaluating, and interpreting of a variety of primary and secondary source materials (e.g. texts, visual and materials objects, oral history).

Interdisciplinary

The module examines and applies methods and insights deriving from several academic disciplines, specifically history, law, political science, philosophy, sociology, economics, cultural studies, and cultural anthropology. The respective methods and insights are combined in pursuit of the exploration and analysis of the historical development of the strategies and technologies of neoliberal governmentality since 1920. The module crosses the ‘traditional boundaries’ between academic disciplines and schools of thought to address new and emerging issues in the discipline of history and in neighbouring disciplines on the subject of neoliberalism. The module encourages students to weave these interdisciplinary methodologies together in order to challenge and impact the complex issue of neoliberalism in the past and present.

Subject specific skills

The module teaches history-specific skill such as critical reasoning and analytical skills, including the capacity for solving problems and thinking creatively about the past. The module also teaches and encourages intellectual and methodological rigour and independence in thinking, including the ability to conduct detailed research on the subject of neoliberalism.

Transferable skills

The module teaches a number of transferable skills such as critical, independent and creative thinking, effective communication, strong writing skills, time management, and independent project organisation. These skills enhance both students' personal development and their future employment opportunities.

Total	150 hours

Private study description

History modules require students to undertake extensive independent research and reading to prepare for seminars and assessments. As a rough guide, students will be expected to read and prepare to comment on three substantial texts (articles or book chapters) for each seminar taking approximately 3 hours. Each assessment requires independent research, reading around 6-10 texts and writing and presenting the outcomes of this preparation in an essay, review, presentation or other related task.
