Description

Introductory description

This module explores how the sick poor sought and negotiated medical care between the 1800s and the arrival of the NHS. The sick poor have never been passive in the face of ill-health and often relied on self-help, over the counter remedies, medical institutions, or hospital social workers (almoners) in times of need. This period witnessed the growth and demise of the infamous workhouse system (established under the New Poor Law of 1834), the shift in charitable hospitals being considered ‘houses of death’ to the sites of modern medicine, and the rapid expansion of pauper asylums. This module will provide an overview of the health and healthcare provision of the poor and working classes in nineteenth and early twentieth century Britain and offers an opportunity to reconstruct patterns of care, patient experience, and working-class lives by using records from the time.

Module aims

This module aims to further knowledge and understanding of population health and healthcare provision since the nineteenth century. It will draw on a range of source materials to consider the health concerns of the poor and their healthcare options during this period. Students will be encouraged to examine the role of historians and scholars in debates on healthcare provision since the nineteenth century and will allow students to articulate their findings in a range of ways. This module will form an excellent basis for further study in the history of medicine, society, the working-class, and social history.

Private study description

History modules require students to undertake extensive independent research and reading to prepare for seminars and assessments. As a rough guide, students will be expected to read and prepare to comment on three substantial texts (articles or book chapters) for each seminar taking approximately 3 hours. Each assessment requires independent research, reading around 6-10 texts and writing and presenting the outcomes of this preparation in an essay or related creative task.
