Description

Introductory description

This module provides students with an introduction to theories of security in international relations. While most work on security in international relations begins from the traditional assumption that security means the preservation of state sovereignty and territorial integrity, this module introduces students to a range of different ways of conceptualising security in international relations and points to the importance of recognising that security is highly contested and contestable. The first half of the module begins by outlining some of the key debates about security in international relations before exploring traditional theoretical approaches and conceptual frameworks. The second half of the module outlines critical theoretical approaches and conceptual frameworks of security, and outlines several core 'images' of security in international relations.

Learning outcomes

By the end of the module, students should be able to:

- To understand the significance of examining fundamental questions of security in international relations: whose security (referent); who provides security; from what threats; and by what means?

- To examine the implications of debates about security theory for contemporary security practices in international relations.
- To evaluate the strengths and weaknesses of the various theoretical approaches to security introduced in the module.
- To evaluate the impact as well as strengths and weaknesses of the images of security introduced in the module.
- To enable students to analyse critically complex ideas, both orally and in writing, in relation to issues influencing contemporary debates about security.
- To encourage students to develop the ability to work both independently and as part of group.
- To allow students to develop library and IT-based research skills through independent research and preparation for class.
